Postcolonial configurations of capital and labor. Thinking with W.E.B. Du Bois and F. Fanon

Abstract:

The talk will start by discussing the notion of “postcolonial capitalism,” which has been the center of lively debates in recent years. The main question addressed will be the possibility to discern a global standard in the development of capitalism as well as its political implications. The relation between capital and “difference” will be critically discussed with reference to the work of such important scholars as Lisa Lowe, David Roediger and Dipesh Chakrabarty. Building on this theoretical discussion, the talk will introduce the work of W.E.B. Du Bois and F. Fanon, delving into the ways in which they grappled with the relation between colonialism, race, and capitalism. Their contribution, and more generally the contribution of the “black radical tradition” to the understanding of the so-called primitive accumulation of capital will be discussed with a focus on the displacement of its spatial coordinates. Both the operations of capital and the composition of living labor appear to be characterized by a wide array of differences that translate into the establishment of hierarchies that traverse the social fabric writ large. One of the main questions asked at the end of the talk will regard the many ways in which the racial and colonial configurations of capital and labor described by Du Bois and Fanon, strike back today in former metropolitan centers.
